Excerpt: . . . HIS LAST POEM. 305 HIS LAST POEM. LEFT UNFINISHED. I. This Rhyme I build on what my old friend Will As having happd himself, once told to me. Of most grave countenance, yet of most keen skill To set a truth within a jest was he. Of a fine wisdom he had store, but still So held in poise of whimsicality, Few deemed him wise but me; it was his nature Rather to stoop than overstretch his stature. II. Nor did he hate the Devil with all his heart, But found some little wrinkles in his horn So comic-taking that he could not part From some small kindness to that king forlorn. I will not name them, we have such an art Of branding little flaws with blame and scorn Beyond proportion; only, like his fellows, This friend of mine had, too, his peccadilloes. III. This fairly wise and pretty virtuous man, Will Brown, to visit his friend Smith went forth. U Who in a town, by the vext ocean And insulated far within the North, Dwelt and had duties. Grim as eye could scan A troop of craggy isles on a wild Firth, Frowned in the face of this poor town; behind it Stretching far round and off, dim moors confined it. IV. Dreary;--but sometimes the repentant Sun Would turn him on his threshold round at even, Surprising sea and isle and moorland dun With bounty, that this town seemed built and paven...
