And though, doubtless, there are many who might have been prevailed upon to relieve me of this task, both more able and willing, I have long since come to the conclusion, without however always acting upon it, that it is always best for every one in the situation in which he is placed, to endeavor, to the best of his ability, to perform all the work, belonging to it, unless some how or other providentially incapacitated. We think this, in the main, a good rule for young men entering upon life to follow, qualified, of course by circumstances. Cases often occur when...
